Understandable architectural theory

By Marvin L. Mcconoughey

Eugene Raskin's "Architecturally Speaking" in the 1966 edition that I have brings clarity and conviction to the sometimes arcane field of architecture. In a series of chapters he addresses architecture, style, unity, scale, rhythm, originality, proportion, sequences, composition, and functionalism, ending with a less helpful chapter on character and honesty.

Raskin writes persuasively, as in this example: "Sequence, then, besides being a progression of elements of mounting interest, each of which is a preparation of the next, is in its totality a preparation of the climax. A design will be a total failure if the preparation is inadequate for the climax, or if the climax does not measure up to the preparation." He is sometimes skeptical of revered definitions, saying "Time and motion are inseparable from the perception of architecture, which is the basis for my strong disagreement with Goethe's euphonious 'frozen music' expression." The book has a particularly good discussion on the user's experiences and perceptions while entering a building.

The author's conviction comes without conceit: "As we continue to discuss those aspects of architecture whose treatment makes it 'good' or 'bad,' I shall necessarily expose my own bias. If the reader's prejudices happen to coincide with mine, he will probably not notice the bias at all."

The book is short: 129 pages including several full page drawings of minor meaning. I know of no other equally concise exposition on architecture that conveys as much information as understandably. This would be my first recommended book for a non-specialist who wanted to know more about the broad principles of architecture without learning an extensive new vocabulary and without delving into architectural history, and specific designs.
